[During the past twenty years or so, Bangladesh has implemented wide-ranging trade policy reforms. These liberalisation measures have led to a remarkable decline in quantitative restrictions, notable opening up of trade in many restricted items, significant rationalization and diminution of import tariffs, fundamental transformation of the foreign exchange regime and promotion of the export-oriented sectors. Although a remarkable rise in exports marks the same period, if the growth of readymade garment sector is to be attributed to a restricted textiles and clothing global trade managed under the Multi-fibre Arrangement (MFA) regime, which expired only recently, the impact of liberalisation in stimulating export response can be doubted. In the aftermath of the MFA phase out, how effective a policy of liberalisation will be in promoting exports is therefore a serious concern. This book reviews the main elements of trade and industrial policy environment in Bangladesh and their evolution to current situation, while examining the trade policy options for supporting exports and growth, It also provides an appraisal of investment climate assessments to identify the most relevant issues for consideration, and attempts a brief review of consideration, and attempts a brief review of constraints associated with some selected non-traditional export sectors.]

[From Grameen Micro-Credit Program to Grameen Kalyan Health Program contains comprehensive information about the Grameen Kalyan Health Program in rural Bangladesh, including its management principles and practices, community-based clinical and outreach services in basic health care, family planning, reproductive health, and a health insurance scheme for the rural poor. This book also describes the local level mobilization strategies of the Grameen Kalyan Health Program, which are based on those of its sister program of Grameen Micro-Credit, and shows how these strategies are enabling the Grameen Health Program to deliver not only effective, efficient, equitable and quality health services to all, but also has the potentiality of achieving scale with sustainability. Based on this review, the author of this book enlists the reasons for optimism that "Health for All" will be achieved very rapidly in Bangladesh with lessons for the rest of the developing countries.]

[The World Trade Organisation (WTO) alongside its commitments to the South Asian free Trade Area (SAFTA), Different multilateral and regional trade negotiations have, however, different implications, For example, while the liberalisation of global agricultural trade-by reducing subsidies in rich countries and thereby causing prices to rise-will benefit many developing country farmers, it may hurt a formidable challenge for the net food importing countries in ensuring food security for their poor populations. Similarly, WTO negotiations in non-agricultural goods aim at improving market access for many, but for the least developed countries, including Bangladesh, currently enjoying tariff preferences in a large of products in major markets, the ensuing outcomes could lead to preference erosion, undermining their competitiveness, Regional trading arrangements can also be challenging as they tend to replace global imports with less efficient regional supplies resulting in adverse welfare consequences.]

[This book contains several essays, which illustrate the state of environment in Bangladesh and Bangladesh's commitment for international conventions, treaties and protocols. Readers will find the environmental hazards, measures so far undertaken and definite guidelines for near future so that Bangladesh can maintain a healthy environment not for the present but for the future generation. The author has free access to data. Data and information used in these essays are relatively more authentic. This is a clarion call for the preservation of forests and biodiversity for sustainable environment. He stressed the need for mass awareness, appropriate technology, environmentally sound and sustainable resource management and etc. He also stressed for capacity building in the environment sector. Continuity and capabilities are required for the people involved in the sector.]

[Political Culture in Bangladesh : Perspective and Analyses presents the thoughts of prominent thinkers about political issues pertaining to Bangladesh about which there is need for serious contemplation and action. It contains ideas about the country's political culture, challenges of democratization, approaches to institution building, issues of leadership and legitimacy, and the continuing saga of conflict between the two main political rivals and possible solutions, Additional chapters address the political economy of formulating national budgets, sustainable development, effects of politics on domestic savings, external political relations, and how to deal with a minority community the Biharis-left since 1971 to the whims and indifference of national and international bodies to be integrated into Bangladesh society or be repatriated.

The Journal of Bangladesh Studies (JBS), from which the thirteen articles were selected, is the premiere journal on Bangladesh that addresses policy issues by encouraging articles from a wide span of social science disciplines and interdisciplinary areas.

JBS receives articles from and reaches and to scholars, researchers, and students of Bangladesh in four continents.]

[This monograph Suggests that the management problems of Dhaka cannot be addressed in a piece meal fashion. Deployment of additional piece meal fashion. Deployment of additional resources and massive investment will be required to meet the large backlog of unmet demands. To make this investment effective, there is a need to fundamentally and systemically rethink the governance of Dhaka. The monograph offers some basic guiding principles that must underpin a reform program. It provides alternative approaches based on a review of good practice international experiences.

The monograph concludes that in reforming Dhaka, policymakers will need to establish an elected, decentralized and accountable city government, that has well defined service delivery responsibilities; has considerable financial autonomy; and has well defined relationship with central government. Consistent with this broad foundation and given the primacy of Dhaka, regardless of the outcome of the forthcoming national elections, the challenge of making Dhaka Livable has become a national priority.]

[This book examines the lives of adolescent boys recruited to dry fish on an isolated island in the Bay of Bengal. It documents the deceitful methods used by Chittagong dalals who recruit them for the fishermen. Transported to Dublarchor, the boys (called dulabhangas) cannot escape the harsh milieu, the work pressure, the blows and the insults. When dismissed without pay, they are powerless. Being outsiders to the fisher community, their claims carry no weight. Dulabhangas absorb the shock of an enterprise which is risky. Fines and levies paid to law enforcing agents by the fishermen are covered through these boys' cheap labour. The book examines the sometimes perverse consequences of interventions meant to protect children from abuse.

This study constitutes one part of a larger research that examines statuses which implicitly or explicitly sanction servitude in Bengali society. Some of these are no longer enacted; others have carried on from the past to the present while a few are fairly recent. The treatment meted out to dulabhangas exemplifies modern day slavery.]
