[Cattle caravans, once a common feature of Philippine road scenery, are now disappearing. Originating from the Central Luzon plain, mainly from the province of Pangasinan, whose old name was Caboloan, the farmers leave their farms when the fields are parched during the dry season abroad covered ox carts bearing handmade goods made of rattan and bamboo. While traveling, they brave the uncertainties of the highways and the city streets much like the ocean mariners. After selling their products the farmers would return to their homes with hard-earned money to send their children to school and to prepare for the next planting season at the onset of the rainy season.]

3. Catholic Church buildings- Philippines

[Containing over 600 new and 160 archival Photographs, Philippine Church Facades is the largest visual compendium of Philippine churches built between 1565 and 1898. The 160 churches studied in the book come from practically all regions of the Philippines, from Luzon to Mindanao. A glossary of architectural terms appended to the book guides readers in studying these churches, while archival photos that parallel contemporary colored photos help them assess the improvement or havoc wrought on the churches in the last 100 years.

These temples of god best reflect Filipino adaptation of European architectural idioms and impress us with their age, state of preservation, and architectural value. The book also serves as an architectural and Photographic map of these churches, which are monuments to the long and arduous tasks of forging a Filipino religious identity and eloquent expressions of the tension created by the fusion of two distinct cultures. Hopefully, readers may well discover the church of their own town, the one they save many times during their childhood but never appreciated.]

[Pinoy dressing first graced the pages of Malaya living in the summer of 1990s as an attempt to continue and integrate indigenous culture into modern design, preserve past cultural values and enrich them with new ideas for contemporary applications. Whether these pertain to fashion in particular or to society in general, the vision was the same-to revive the tapestry of our lives as Filipinos through the evolution of fashion. Sixteen years hence, we are delighted to find these valuable vignettes of cultural identity compiled into one beautiful volume of collected work. Through the pages of Pinoy Dressing, we see the evolution of Philippine fashion as a stimulating chronicle of history whose relics, influences, and present day application continue to shape, color, and embellish the very fiber of our being.]

Cinema Studies

Lost films of Asia / Edited by Nick Deocampo
Pasig City : Anvil Publishing Inc., c2006
xii, 104 p. : ill. ; 23 cm.
978-971-27-1861-8
$ 22.00

[Works by Asian film pioneers like Leung Siu-bo and Lai Man-wai of Hong Kong, Jose Nepomuceno of the Philippines, the Wasuwat Brothers of Thailand, B.S.Rajhans of Malaysia, George Tarr of New Zealand, Woon-kyu Na of South Korea, and screen masters like Yasujiro Ozu, Kenji Mizoguchi, and Lino Brocka are included in this anthology but, alas, only as memory. Copies of their films important in charting the history of cinema in their respective countries and the region are forever gone. Films like Mizoguchi's Kyoren no Onna Shisho (1926), hailed as one of the best Japanese films ever made, are lamentably nowhere to be found. By "lost", the films may have been destroyed by natural or man-made causes. While there are only fragments or video copies that survive, the actual films are gone.

Films are no different from prehistoric carvings on cave walls or ancient calligraphy on scrolls. They tell the stories of our time. They are one of our modern-day cultural recorders. The value of "lost" films lies in the regard given them by their respective countries and the international community for their historical, artistic, social, technological, political, and archival worth.

Lost films of Asia hopes not only to awaken nostalgia of the past but also to make readers appreciate what remains of the film treasures that face certain danger of disappearance and to inspire people to help in the preservation of the film- an important recorder of our history- for this generation and those to come.]

[This collection acknowledges what was now become an almost trite observation: the industrial age has been overtaken by the informational one and in the process old boundaries have either disappeared or become extremely porous. A world organized around sovereign nation-states, each one with its distinctive culture jealously guarded against foreign interlopers, is rapidly disappearing or continues to survive as nostalgia. Globalization sweeps aside everything before it or so it seems. But while the national is increasingly threatened, the local is reasserting its primary. The new media of communication discussed in this collection makes possible the localization of the global as well as the globalization of the local.

This collection is the first attempt to discuss the new global media with Asia as its main focus. The biggest markets for these technologies are in the emerging economies of China, India and Southeast Asia, Japan and South Korea have surpassed most western countries in their deployment of the new technology. Information is the only major resource whose production, distribution, and consumption are notionally available to everyone.]

[Democracy has enabled Southeast Asian journalists to poke their noses into areas of public life from which they had previously been barred, including what officials own, how much elections cost, and who finances campaigns. Never in the history of these countries has so much light been shed on what was, especially during authoritarian rule, kept in the dark. In the Philippines, Thailand and Indonesia, investigative journalists are testing the boundaries of freedom and exposing the underside of societies undergoing rapid change.]

[This book contains semi-technical reference materials, consolidating the relevant and current information about the status of and threats to Philippine biodiversity at the genetic, species, and ecosystem / Landscape levels. A broad understanding of biodiversity opens up a wide range of strategies for the implementation of biodiversity conservation measures. As discussed in the book, the conservation of biodiversity is needed for ecological, economic and social reasons. To achieve sustainability for the nation, integration of all three of these is essential.

One of the most effective means to complement increasing research interest in and strong commitment to biodiversity conservation, specifically among young Filipinos, is through the availability of comprehensive and comprehensive reference materials upon which and informal education and more in-depth research can be built.

The book will benefit relevant government agencies, conservation-oriented organizations, and natural science majors and / or non – majors at the tertiary (college level of learning. Policy and decision makers on the management of Philippine biodiversity will also become better informed through this book.]

A time to roar : ending 28 at 82 reviving the Bedan Animo / Jude P. Roque
 Philippines : Booster's Club, Inc., c2007
 194 p. : ill. ; 25 cm.
 $ 65.00

[This year, there was a conflagration, a feast of passion reminding all of us how it was when our love was new. However, there is such a miracle, phenomenon or blessing as Benedictine or Bedan bonding.

This festschrift of sorts, meant for scholars with high basketball IQ's or the common fan alike, is an effort to record the story of how San Beda ended a 28-year drought, spiced by looks into the past and glimpses into the future. There were those of us who started in the venue named after a great Bedan son, Ninoy Aquino, and we were transformed in Araneta as the Red Sea.]

Fully illustrated and featuring contributions from notable writers and artists, this book recalls how one of the world's best natural ports became the hub of socio-economic, cultural and artistic exchange within Southeast Asia, and later, between East and West.

It also presents Manila Bay's role in shaping a nation. Finally the book traces the events leading to the shrinkage and economical decline of this body of water and presents a pattern for its rehabilitation and redevelopment.

This book is meant not only to serve as a popular reader but also as a reference on Manila Bay.]

[In this book, the history of the Mountain Province is seen to fall into three distinct periods. In the first of these, when the Republican Party controlled the Presidency of the United States, the emphasis was upon creating a form of mountain reservation for the "non-Christian tribes" of the Cordillera Central. After a series of adventurous expeditions had been undertaken in order to define the ethnology of the region, policy was directed toward developing roads and trails whereby put an end to the intertribal feuding and headhunting, thus laying the foundations for the future civilization of these "wild men", as Dean C. Worcester was in habit of describing these mountain peoples. This policy of creating mountain reservation inevitable lent itself to "divide-and-rule" tactics on the part of the imperial power. The second period was inaugurated by the incoming Democrats in 1913, when the idea of separating the mountain peoples from their lowland Christian neighbors was abandoned in favor of a policy aimed at achieving their integration in the body politic of the Philippine nation, and the emphasis shifted from the building of roads and trails to the provision of better and more widespread health and educational facilities. The third period, hastened by the events of the Second World War, saw the mountain peoples over the local control of their own affairs.]

[This little volume is a valuable contribution to the lore that accumulates about every great city in the world- part social history, part myth, and part love song. Manila might be sinking under the weight of problems proclaimed every day by newspaper columnists and TV commentators. It might be plagued by calamities, both natural and manmade. Its historical monuments might be wrecked by unthinking politicians, its walls and bridges defaced by ugly posters and graffiti; its hapless pedestrians killed by reckless drivers and ineptly constructed billboards. It will survive nonetheless, because people like the writers of this book will not give up on it.]

He is presented here as the chief interpreter of President McKinley's "benevolent assimilation" program, as a legislator, chief executive, trouble shooter, lobbyist, diplomat, judge and a propagandist. Towards the end, the book argues that Taft is a major character in Philippine history because he orchestrated the establishment of American colonial institution in the Philippines, an episode in Philippine history that has great effect on the life of the Filipinos until the present time.]

[Jalandoni believed that love needs freedom for the lovers to be happy and to create what is good and right, not only for themselves, but also for their nation and countrymen. Thus, it is not merely love between man and women, no matter how pure and complete, that Jalandoni was celebrating. Although they were already blissfully married and wealthy and highly respected by society, Nita and Ely felt that their happiness was not yet complete because their beloved country had not yet been liberated from poverty and oppression from the foreign colonial rulers. This is why the couple joined the Katipunan that was organized by Andres Bonifacio. They donated a great part of their wealth to the Revolution of 1896. In the end, Ely even offered his life in the battlefield for his country's freedom.

The story is told through the panugiron, a method of narration in Hiligaynon fiction by which a central consciousness that may be supplemented by other narrators tells the story in the first person. The author integrates panugiron with dreamatized narrativization to structure the architectonics of the novel, there by showing Jalandoni's skill narrative art. This is why during her heyday before the war, her novels were awaited with excitement and, in our language today, were best-sellers.]

[The nature and function of the text as literature is described as reflexive refraction of its intrinsic elements, out of which arise its qualities and values that can contribute to the humanist and nationalist canons in nation building. The text reflexively refracts with other texts in the various continua within the nation and beyond national boundaries in which it exists and is received. Reflexive refraction is formulated as a way of seeing the world and reality. Things events, nature, natural phenomena, and everything interact with each other and among themselves endlessly and boundlessly. The process creates new entities with their own identity out of the qualities and values of the refractors as they reflexively interact. Reflexive refraction as a method of integrating minorities into the national without loss of their identity and individuality is pointed out as a hedge against multiculturalism and postcolonialism. These critical discourses have been realized to aid globalization in the damage it is causing the ethnic, the regional, and other minorities that threaten them with extinction.]

[When Don Quijote de la Mancha was published in 1605, Miguel de Cervantes (1547 – 1616) was about to enter his sixties, an advanced age for the times. He had behind him a life full of hardships and an unsuccessful writing career. Don Quijote changed if not his ill – fated existence, his literary reputation, for the book became an overnight bestseller. Reprints and translations of the novel were published different countries: The first English translation of the novel appeared in 1612; the French version followed in 1614; the German and the Italian ones in 1621 and 1622. As early as 1605 there were copies of the book in Mexico – and most probably some of them must have been shipped into the Philippines not much later. In 1614, an unauthorized sequel to the novel signed by a certain Avellaneda, promoted Cervantes to come out with the second part of Don Quijote in 1615. The masterpiece was thus complete. Cervantes died the following year.

Yet underneath that glory, Don Quijote still retains the miracle of a fresh experience whenever a reader opens its pages. Writers F. Sionil Jose, Alfred Yuson and Vicente Garcis Groyon accepted Instituto Cervantes' Invitation to share their insight on the novel in three lectures held during 2005. Gathered in the present volume, these lectures stand as proof of what wondrous outcome could occur if a Filipino writer reads Don Quijote.]

Because of this, some traditional forms have been lost; many are dying from neglect.

The cultural center of the Philippines, with this project of recording on video disc the principal Philippine sarswelas, seeks not only to preserve this traditional art form widely patronized in the pre-war years, but also to revive and popularize it.

Showcasing the most important sarswelas produced in the different Philippine languages in the 20th century, this series hopes to define Filipino achievement in this genre and Filipino identity as distilled by this form. Most of all, through this series the CCP encourages contemporary theatre artists to revitalize the musical and development it into a truly national dramatic form.]

[Aside from many being pilgrimage sites (Basilica Minore de Penafrancia, Minor Basilica of the Santo Nino, etc.), a number of churches are also sites of significant historical events in the country (Barasoain Church, Santa Barbara Church, etc.), Churches are also unique structures in themselves, using diverse materials (stone, wood, concrete, etc.) as well as styles: Aztec, Byzantine, Chinese, Gothic, Islamic, Mudejar, Renaissance, and Romanque, used singularly or in combination has created stunning churches with whimsical facades and lavish interiors.

Four Philippine churches, recognized as fusions of European Baroque interpreted by Chinese and Filipino craftsmen, have received international acclamation by being included in the UNESCO world Heritage list. In 2001, the national Museum also honored twenty-six other Spanish-era churches as National Cultural Treasures. As a result, these churches, as well as many others built in the seventeenth, eighteenth as well as twentieth centuries, have become tourist attractions in themselves.]

[“Passion for Catechesis” is a unique blend of theory and practice, of planning and implementation; of dreams and fulfillment – three “pairs” that have characterized all these long and fruitful years of Archbishop Legaspi’s commitment to the growth of catechesis in all its aspects. These are the three factors that have brought many of us to almost identify him with the catechetical visioning and achievements of the catechetical ministry in the Philippines – area in which he has been and still as is an inspiration even to bishops well beyond the boundaries of our country. This is why “Legaspi” has become for many of us a new way of spelling “catechesis”.]

[“Heart to Heart” is a book intended not only for the priests to know how priestly identity and ministry depend much on a Christ-centered spirituality; it is also intended for the lay people to know how the priests have to reflect, pray, and serve with their hearts truly committed to loving that overcomes human frailties. Reading the content of the book is not just to know what is priestly identity and ministry, but to also inspire the heart to love further the gift of the ministerial priesthood that is lived in various realities with the intent of bringing what is human to the divine, to what is truly salvific.]

[The men whose biographical sketches are given here belong to four nationalities: Spanish, American, Italian, Filipino. They had one thing in common: they were Jesuits who worked in the Philippines.

In wartime, relatively few members of the army are heroes who get medals. But war is not won by heroes. It is won by the multitude of ordinary soldiers who march and fight and risk their lives and get killed, unknown men and poorly rewarded, Similar to them are most of the Jesuits whose biographical sketches are given here.]

- [A film on Filipinos in Denmark, an etnik minority group which, away from the limelight is allowed to nurture itself, without encountering huge problems, and yet holding on to one’s original culture, family values and religion.
 - A film on a model for integration, that may perhaps be useful to other groups. We have to do with an ethnic group, that in self awareness demands participation on equal footing with the Danes, esp. in the local milieu, so cultural barriers are hurdled, myths punctured and prejudices and biases quashed.]
