Archaeological excavations have unearthed evidence of human habitation dating back over 13.000 years as well as important clues to the development of agriculture. In historic times, caves became integrated into many aspects of Buddhism and large monasteries have developed around certain sacred caves, whilst many others from the humble abode of a solitary monk.

This book brings together these diverse aspects of caves in northern Thailand for the first time, with chapters on geology, environment, archaeology, temples and folklore, uses and conservation, exploration and photography, In addition, it presents unique portraits of over 100 individual caves t provide a fascinating cross-section of caves of northern Thailand as they are today.]

[The Cicadas of Thailand: General and Particular Characteristics is the first of two volumes on Thai cicadas, the most fascinating and also least known representatives of a family of sonorous insects. Cicadas neither sing, nor stridulate, but tymbalize. The volume reveals the existence and the double life, larval and imaginal, of cicadas encountered during six years of research in Thailand's sub-mountainous forests. The body of the text includes two chapters discussing general characteristics, acoustic and procreative theology, and exceptional or enigmatic aspects and behaviour. The text is enriched by drawings and photographs, mostly of living insects. It is accompanied by a CD comprising forty cicada sound productions (or tymbalizations), the acoustics made visual in ID and ethological cards, which form an original feature of this pioneering study.]

It also introduces the main categories of traditional 'Sanskrit and Pali grammar, derawing on, in particular, the medieval Pali text Saddaniti, by Aggavamsa. Each grammatical from is illustrated by examples taken from Pali texts, mostly canonical. Although some previous knowledge of Sanskrit would be helpful, the book can also be used by those without previous linguistic training. A bibliographical appendix refers to other, complementary resources.]

[The book reveals how Thailand's often corrupt logging industry in exploiting forest resources not just in the country but across its borders and how other efforts to cash in the forest areas such as establishing large-scale tree plantations are bringing their own set of ecological problems and social conflicts.
In examining the critical problems with the forest conservation ideology of the Thai state, the book unveils how conservation areas such as national parks are forcing more restrictions on access of forest resources by local communities as well as discouraging local forest conservation efforts. Meanwhile, new legal initiatives such as the Community Forest Act for increased local control over forests are struggling to materialize.]

[We are all travelers on a long, amazing journey through a universe that is never still. It is a journey filled with danger and opportunity. Each one of us has the will to choose our direction. And each of us is responsible for all of our actions. Our mind is the key. Like it or not, ready or not, our mind is always creating, affecting our world and ourselves, affecting our present and our present and our future. If we use our mind wisely, its tremendous power can bring more joy, success, freedom, and happiness into our lives. To do this, we need to understand how our mind works; how our intentions and actions affect our internal and external worlds. We need to understand karma.]

[This book examines the challenges faced by young Muslim female athletes from Malaysia, Brunei, and Indonesia in competitive sports. After presenting a valuable socio-historical survey of the Malay world before, during, and after colonization, the author focuses in on contemporary social dynamics, including the emergence of Muslim women competing at the international level. Through surveys and interviews conducted at the Twenty-Second South East Asian Games in Hanoi, she captures the athletes' experiences and perspectives as they compete, often under rules that conflict with Islamic practice.]
