The Story of Kadirun / Semaoen ; Translated by Ian Campbell, Jan Lingard, Marcus Susanto, and Adrian Vickers

The Lontar Foundation, Indonesia 2014

xxxiv, 186p. 22cm.

9786029144284

$ 29.50 / PB

The hero Kadiroen, the son of a head village, is in the service of the civil service, and he performs his duties intelligently and diligently. He manages to solve a number of difficult problems and gets rapid promotion. However, after a while, he realizes that he can achieve far less than he would like, due to opposition from his colleagues and mistrust by the population. This results in a deep personal crisis. He then becomes acquainted with communist ideas about economy and society; he feels the pull of such ideas and while still working as a government official, he begins to write articles for the Communist Party's daily articles which cause the newspaper some trouble with the authorities. After careful consideration, Kadiroen decides to resign from his position in the civil service so that he can devote himself entirely to his job as a journalist in the service of the People's Movement. Thus, he finds the spiritual peace he has sought. Alongside this story of the hero, a story unfolds about Ardinah, with whom Kadiroen falls in love in the course of his duties as a civil servant. The heroine manages to free herself from her marriage to the despised and cruel head village with the help of comrades in the Party, she is eventually able to marry Kadiroen.

The hero Kadiroen, the son of a head village, is in the service of the civil service, and he performs his duties intelligently and diligently. He manages to solve a number of difficult problems and gets rapid promotion. However, after a while, he realizes that he can achieve far less than he would like, due to opposition from his colleagues and mistrust by the population. This results in a deep personal crisis. He then becomes acquainted with communist ideas about economy and society; he feels the pull of such ideas and while still working as a government official, he begins to write articles for the Communist Party's daily articles which cause the newspaper some trouble with the authorities. After careful consideration, Kadiroen decides to resign from his position in the civil service so that he can devote himself entirely to his job as a journalist in the service of the People's Movement. Thus, he finds the spiritual peace he has sought. Alongside this story of the hero, a story unfolds about Ardinah, with whom Kadiroen falls in love in the course of his duties as a civil servant. The heroine manages to free herself from her marriage to the despised and cruel head village with the help of comrades in the Party, she is eventually able to marry Kadiroen.
